RUSSELL MULLINS HOME FROM FRANCE

Russell Mullins, one of Farmington's heroes, arrived home last Friday night from France. He went through some of the most serious fighting that the American Expeditionary Forces saw. He was with the U. S. Marine Corps—Devil Dogs, the Germans call them—who filled the Huns with fear by their fierce fighting at Chateau-Thierry, Belleau Woods and in other engagements. Russell was wounded a number of times by machine gun bullets and also suffered from pneumonia while in the hospital. He has practically recovered now and looks well, though, of course, he has not gained back his former strength. With the good care that he is sure to receive at home, he will soon regain his former health. He has brought home with him several relics of the war, including his trench shoes, canteen, knapsack and mess kit.

Farmington welcomes him as one of her greatest heroes.

20,000 MOTOR TRUCKS FREE TO STATE FOR ROAD WORK

More than $45,000,000 worth of motor trucks are about to be distributed by the Secretary of Agriculture through the bureau of public roads to the State Highway Departments. These trucks have been declared surplus by the War Department and are being distributed to the States under the provisions of section 7 of the post-office appropriation bill. They must be used by the States on roads constructed in whole or in part by federal aid, for which $200,000,000 in addition to the former appropriation was given to the States under the same bill. All that the States must do to acquire the use of these 20,000 trucks, which range in capacity from 2 to 5 tons, is to pay the loading and freight charges.

Of the 20,000 motor vehicles to be acquired practically free by the States, 11,000 are new and 9,000 are used, but all are declared to be in serviceable condition. The motors will be apportioned to States only upon request of the State Highway Departments on the basis of the requests received from the respective States, and in accordance with the apportionment provided in the federal aid law approved in 1916. The requirements of the law are such that the bureau of public roads can not distribute any trucks to counties or individuals.

HOW PRIVATE "LITTLE" KELLY RAN THROUGH A BARRAGE, ATTACKED A MACHINE-GUN CREW AND CAPTURED THEM ALL

Some time ago, after the Army of Occupation had entered German territory, General Pershing went to Coblenz to pin on the breast of an American doughboy the Congressional Medal of Honor. The man wasn't in Coblenz when the General arrived, and when a search was made for him he was finally found digging ditches some 28 miles distant from the town.

Nothing, probably, was farther from the man's mind that day than the thought of being called before the Commander-in-Chief to receive the highest decoration for valor within the power of his country to bestow. When summoned he couldn't for a time understand what it was all about or why such an honor was to be conferred upon him.

It took the reading of the citation to answer his questioning mind and take him back to that day in the Argonne when his cleaning out of a German machine-gun nest under the most hazardous circumstances made him worthy in the eyes of his superiors to wear the coveted medal.

It was on October 3, 1918, and the Americans were laying down one of their heaviest barrages when the officers of the front line of infantry noticed that their men were being mowed down by a machine-gun nest that was beyond the reach of the barrage. Something had to be done about it, and that immediately.

Private "Little" Johnny Kelly of the 6th Marines was working close to the commanding officer of his unit. Grasping the emergency and the need for immediate action, he turned to him and said:

"I know where those fellows are plugging us from. If you'll let me, I think I can go and get 'em."

The officer took from his eyes the glasses with which he had been searching the landscape in front of his lines, and, turning to the little private at his elbow, answered:

"But, Kelly, they're beyond the barrage. Better wait until the barrage lifts."

"But I'm sure I can do it right now," persisted Kelly. "Just say the word, sir, and I'm off."

"All right," replied the officer. "Beat it."

Kelly needed no second word. He was off in a flash, and straight for the point where his keen eye had seen the nest was situated. Right through the barrage he went without a look to right or left; it was eyes front with Kelly all the way with no stops.

Up and down over the uneven ground he went, in and out of shell holes, and before the busy boches in the nest were aware of his coming he was upon them. Single-handed, he attacked like a demon and in less time than it takes to tell it Private "Little" Kelly was on his way back driving before him eight German prisoners, and four of them were carrying the troublesome gun.

GROW FALL POTATOES

A second or fall crop of Irish potatoes can be grown profitably from central Missouri southward, says J. T. Rosa, Jr., of the University of Missouri College of Agriculture. In fact, in favorable seasons when frost does not come too early, the fall crop may be more satisfactory than the ordinary spring crop. The advantages of the fall crop are, that it matures in cool moist fall weather which is ideal for the potato; the tubers are large, free of disease, and bright colored; since they do not mature until cold weather, fall potatoes keep especially well in storage, and frequently may be kept in ordinary storage without sprouting or shriveling until late in the following spring; the eating quality of fall potatoes is far better than that of the spring crop, which matures in hot weather and is notoriously poor in quality. Another advantage that may be especially important to the potato grower is the fact that tubers from the fall crop are particularly good for seed purposes the following spring. In fact, experiments at the Missouri Experiment Station have shown that best results with the spring crop are obtained by planting fall home-grown seed.

The fall potato crop should be planted around July 1 in central Missouri, and a little later further south. The question of seed is important. In southern sections tubers from the spring crop can be used for seed purposes, if they are ripened by spreading out thinly on the ground under a tree for a couple of weeks before planting. It has been found that the best method of obtaining seed for the fall crop is to place seed in cold storage about the time the spring crop is planted. They will remain in perfect condition without sprouting for months, at a temperature of 35 degrees. Varieties for fall crop purposes may be the same as for the spring crop, such as the Early Ohio, and Irish Cobbler. There are varieties, however, which are especially adapted to this season, such as the McCormick, Peachblow and the Banner. These varieties are capable of withstanding heat in midsummer, and produce a large crop of tubers of good eating and keeping quality. However, these varieties are worthless for spring planting. The main difficulty in growing fall potatoes is obtaining a good stand. Use of large seed pieces and planting in fine, well prepared soil just after a rain will usually result in a fair stand.
